Market Commentary

U.S. equities rose modestly (S&P 500 was up 2.3%) in the third quarter amid volatility. A reversal in AI supply chain and semiconductor stocks, among the market's best performers in the first half of the year, tempered results. Semiconductor stocks fell in the quarter as companies and consumers focused on more efficient AI usage, raising questions about the sustainability of demand growth and earnings momentum. Despite the decline in semiconductor shares, the Information Technology (IT) sector was the largest contributor to returns, led by the Software industry.

Elevated inflation, resilient U.S. economic growth, and large-scale borrowing to finance AI infrastructure buildouts added upward pressure on interest rates, and the Federal Reserve voted unanimously to raise short-term interest rates by 25 basis points, the first increase since 2023. Long-term rates also climbed, with the 10-year Treasury yield reaching its highest level since 2007.

Market leadership remained narrow, with the five largest stocks accounting for 31% of the market capitalization of the S&P 500 and 22% of the Russell 1000 Value, a level of concentration that has caused index returns to depend heavily on the performance of a handful of companies.[2] IT is the largest sector at 40% of the S&P 500 and 21% of the Russell 1000 Value.

Valuations across the U.S. equity market remain elevated, while the spread between value and growth stocks narrowed: the Russell 1000 Value traded at 17.2 times forward earnings vs. 21.5 times for the Russell 1000 Growth Index. The Russell 1000 Value outpaced the Russell 1000 Growth by two percentage points during the quarter.[3]

Portfolio Strategy

This has been a challenging period, as the Fund underperformed the S&P 500 and Russell 1000 Value by 7.6 and 14.1 percentage points, respectively, year to date.[4] Uncertainty around the impact of AI has caused dislocations, depending on whether investors view a company as an AI beneficiary or victim. However, at Dodge & Cox, our bottom-up investment approach is grounded in valuation discipline and rigorous analysis of company fundamentals. In our experience, market dislocations like this have often created attractive long-term opportunities.

We initiated positions in strong business franchises in the first nine months of the year, such as Roper Technologies, where we believe the market has overestimated the potential negative impact of AI. We also added to companies we believe can benefit from AI adoption over our long-term horizon, such as Microsoft and Amazon.

We also see opportunities in industries we view as relatively insulated from AI disruption. Health Care is one such area: many companies in the sector face limited disruption risk and could benefit from using AI over time. In Health Care, we continued to reduce the Fund's exposure to pharmaceutical companies and increase holdings in the Life Sciences Tools & Services and Health Care Equipment & Supplies industries. We initiated a position in Boston Scientific, a leading global developer of medical devices specializing in cardiovascular, endoscopy, urology, and other therapies. We also started a position in Danaher, taking advantage of a once-in-a-decade bioprocessing recovery cycle that followed three years of post-COVID customer inventory destocking. These actions reflect our portfolio construction approach: we seek to buy strong franchises where short-term pressures have created attractive entry points.

Outlook

This quarter underscored the volatility of short-term results, particularly in an environment marked by narrow market leadership and elevated index concentration. We remain focused on long-term fundamentals over our three- to five-year investment horizon and encourage investors to maintain a similar perspective. Notwithstanding the Fund's current underperformance, the portfolio trades at an attractive valuation of 13.4 times forward earnings, a significant discount to both the S&P 500 and the Russell 1000 Value at 19.2 times and 17.2 times, respectively. The portfolio remains diversified across a broad range of investment themes, which we believe is especially important in this volatile environment. Thank you for your continued confidence in Dodge & Cox.
